Josef Hofmann, the planist, will sall greatly increase fire hazards in such for Europe to-morrow aboard the Nieu houses. A careful study of the experiment of the city of New York convinces students of the subject that no building should be permitted to-exceed six stories in height, unless built entirely fireproof, and that no building of five or six stories and that no building of five or six stories and that no building of five or six stories and that no building of five or six stories and that no building of five or six stories and that no building of five or six stories and that no building of five or six stories and that no building of five or six stories are stories and that no building of five or six stories are stories and that no building of five or six stories are stories are stories.

first floor fireproof and a fireproof stair "To permit the sort of construction suggested would be to put a number of houses in the condition which twenty years ago was declared to be unsafe and make many of them worse than they were at that time. I do not be-lieve the men responsible for housing legislation will seriously consider such a proposal."
